From solitary confinement to the stage, teaching leaders to simulate decisions, not predict them

Christian Torres is a former NYPD officer who spent nearly a decade in federal prison, including 18 months in solitary confinement. In a place designed to break people, he developed something unexpected: a mental framework and a passion for simulating future outcomes using probabilistic modeling.

Today, he is a Decision Intelligence Speaker and Strategist and the founder of Stark Analytics. He helps companies stress-test major growth decisions before they commit capital, working with leadership teams in professional services, manufacturing, and construction, where growth decisions carry real financial consequences.

His keynotes challenge leaders to confront a hard truth: it is our addiction to certainty that makes us vulnerable. The leaders who learn to simulate outcomes instead of predicting them make systematically better decisions than those chasing the perfect answer.
